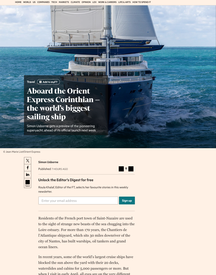
CNN
Cannes Lions
All Rights In Digital
#FTCannesLions

#CHAMPIONING CREATIVITY THROUGH CONNECTIONS

FT Live at CANNES LIONS



Travel | A WEEK AT...

Aboard the Orient Express Corinthian — the world's biggest sailing ship

Seven nights on the inaugural voyage of the luxurious vessel, which supports ahead of its official launch next week

Simon Usborne

Published 1 hour ago

Unlock the Editor's Digest for free

Roula Khalaf, Editor of the FT, selects her favourite stories in this weekly newsletter.

Enter your email address | Sign up

Residents of the French port town of Saint-Nazaire are used to the sight of strange new hunks of the sea dragging into the Loire estuary. For more than 170 years, the Chantiers de l'Atlantique shipyard, which sits up stream from the mouth of the city of Nantes, has built warships, oil tankers and grand ocean liners.

In recent years, some of the world's largest cruise ships have blocked the sun above the yard with their sun decks, waterslides and cabins for 5,000 passengers or more. But when I visit in early April, my arrival was met by two different vessel-size mooring complexes in the mile-long Bassin de Penhoët.

I'm the first journalist to step aboard the Orient Express Corinthian, which will be the largest sailing ship ever launched with a gross tonnage of 17,850 tonnes. It looks like the love child of a sheikh's superyacht, a cruise liner and a child's drawing of a sailboat. Its three carbon-fibre masts rising more than 200 metres above the waterline.

The yacht's rigid sails, which fold like paper fans on top of boom-like balconies when not in use, are expected to cut fuel consumption by 40 per cent (though it can run under wind power alone, there's also a massive engine room below deck). The Corinthian, which will be the first vessel in a new sevenstrong collection to bear both the Orient Express name and a nautical arms race involving some of the biggest names in luxury hospitality.

The Orient Express Corinthian leaving Hull off the coast of eastern France © Jean-Marie Liot

One of the three sixteen-litre-mast C-Bot Cokley Sportsmasts. Do the math © The hands-free SSS method, above the waterline © Maxime Cuerq

The ship, which has 54 cabins with a capacity of 100 guests (the crew will number 170), is the first vessel in a fleet being launched by Orient Express, a name steeped in old-school glamour that dates back to the 1880s. Accor, the French hotel group, completed the purchase of the brand from Pearson's national rail company ENGIE, almost 140 years after the first Orient Express service rolled out east of Paris.

In 2022, the luxury goods conglomerate LVMH partnered with Accor to accelerate not only the revival of OE trains but also new hotels and yachts, which will eventually appear on linked itineraries. In a meeting of proud French corporate powers, OE hailing Yachts appointed the Saint-Nazaire shipyard, which has been building cruise ships including the new flagship and retains the yard's dockside cranes.

Ahead of the official launch on May 2, I'm taking a tour with Maxime Faugeas, a Paris-based architect and designer. He has been tasked with translating OE's art deco heritage, much of which is based on mythology that dates back to the layers of lacquer since the interwar golden age of travel.

Follow the topics in this article

Travel | Follow topic
Yachts & Marinas | Follow topic
FT Edit | Follow topic
Orient Express | Follow topic
Simon Usborne | Follow topic

Wearing hard hats and hi-vis vests, we step into an environment of controlled chaos: more than 250 workers are finishing the yacht's interiors, hanging artworks and signs, unrolling bespoke carpets and finishing some of the cabins.

"I'm not denying much of the interiors," says d'Angeac, who's 65 and has been working on this project for almost four years. (He's also creative director for the first restored OE train, which will start linking Paris and Istanbul next year. The OE Belle Vita, a new Italian train based in Rome, was launched in 2023). He frequently passes the test himself, sleeping in a cabin on board for a few days to spot hassles ever their chance to present the new floors. I wonder what the French is for "frazzled".

An 'appointment' passing' suite on board the Corinthian

A desk space in one of the suites © Photographed for The FT by Alex Cokley-Sportsmasts

Inside the yacht's club at the rear centre of deck five

Alfie Spiffer wearing a scuba in Photographed for The FT by Alex Cokley-Sportsmasts

We start, as passengers will, in the main saloon, a vast lounge that stretches the full 125 metres width of the Corinthian. It sets the tone for the whole yacht, with a contemporary take on gilded age excess. Its while the darkwood panelled walls are inspired by the Normandie, the French ocean liner launched during a high-circle of translucent, alabaster. "Art deco is not an old style, I see it as a kind of grammar," d'Angeac says as he surveys the space, which is still waiting for furniture to be installed. "Everyone can write their own book."

It's not that the designer is short of backup to draw from – at sea as well as on the rails. The first Orient Express train service was launched in 1883 by Le Compagnie Internationale des Wagons-Lits. In 1919, the Belgian businessman Georges Nagelmackers, was purportedly inspired by George Pullman's American sleeper trains, as well as the early transatlantic ocean liners.

France was a major player: its Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (CGT) emerged in the 1850s to take on what became Britain's Cunard Line. Originally conceived to deliver mail, the state-subsidised ships morphed into lavish passenger liners that were also hybrids, being powered by steam as well as sails.

Panels of a painted stencil, specially made for the Corinthian inside C-Bot Cokley-Sportsmasts

A clever use of the planet © by Jeremy Liot-Marie Cokley-Sportsmasts

A clever use of the planet © by Jeremy Liot-Marie Cokley-Sportsmasts

By the 1930s, CGT had done away with sails for its grandest ships. The Normandie, launched in 1935, was powered by the same shipyard as the Corinthian. It first set sail for New York in 1935, breaking speed records with a crossing of just over four days. It was also a showcase for French style and culinary prowess, with lavish art deco interiors and a dining room with a huge illuminated Lalique glass, that could seat more than 700.

Among several nods to the Normandie, d'Angeac has commissioned has relief panels in plaster and wood by a French artist called Jean Dunand, who was also behind one of the oldest ship in the art deco pioneer Jean Dunand. There are also more than 200 prints by Roger Schall, who was commissioned by a French magazine to capture the Normandie's maiden voyage before going on to become a renowned fashion and wedding photographer.

There are acres of teak and exotic veneers — walnut and smoked eucalyptus among them — and scenes of marble. On the most struck by the Calacatta Violetta marble in the bathroom of the Owner's Suite, a penthouse with a private deck at the rear that looks down a giant slab of tranquil. The spacious, 47 square-metre "suite panoramique", which is the smallest on the Corinthian, also features a generous daybed under an enormous window.

A depiction of one completed with a view on board the Corinthian © Alex Cokley-Sportsmasts

Cabins, all of which include butler service, quickly rise in scale and grandeur up to the extensive deck penthouse suites, which I'm told are not ready even for a hard-hat viewing. The top-suite name-maker Agatha Christie only occupies the all section of the deck with a sweeping wraparound terrace and private gym.

Prices are, shall we say, buoyant: a panoramic suite, sleeping two, costs from €1,500 per night in low season, rising in Marseille to Rome to Corsica in July, rising to more than €30,000 for a six-night Barbados-Lisbon Atlantic crossings the ship will complete twice a year between its Caribbean and Mediterranean seasons.

Yet OE is confident demand is strong in a busy new sector, as resort-hotel groups pile into the evolving industry with an armada of luxury vessels. Ritz Carlton has launched three ships in the past two years, while Aman has its Explorations shipyard. The up-scale Four Seasons I launched in March, while Aman's Armogan is due to cruise into the Med next year with just 48 suites.

A computer-generated image of Orient's Armogan, due to launch next year

The Eric Cantona Guinness Experience © Jean-Marie Liot and Alex Liot-Marie Cokley-Sportsmasts

The Four Seasons I which has its maiden voyage in the Pacific Ocean next year © Four Seasons Yachts

These floating resorts all have superyacht styling but are closer to resort-cruise liners than purebred gin palaces. Their capacity ranging from about 100 to 450 passengers in the case of Aman's Armogan. Even the Corinthian, which is the smallest vessel — or the sails — that the Corinthian is about to bring to the Mediterranean. "I'm not scared of this competition, we are not even in the same category," d'Angeac says with a smile and a dismissive Gallic shrug.

After the designer gets lost in the sprawling kitchens and service areas of the ship, we emerge blinking into the sunlight on to Pyrbridge, the huge front section of the seventh deck. I look up at the towering masts, which have been designed to fold down so that the ship can pass under bridge at the entrance to New York City's cruise ports. I can now see the carbon-reinforced folded sails sitting on their balconies, which themselves look like yacht hulls. It's not a sight that would please a maritime purist, perhaps, but it will certainly suit the Gentlemen's Quarter in seas that are saturated with modest yachts.

The Corinthian at sea, during trials off the west coast of France © Jean-Marie Liot

The interiors make generous use of marble in suite bathrooms © Alex Crétey-Systermans

In the middle of the deck, I look down into what OE is calling the "couloir de nage", a 17-metre pool for length swimming that sits at the bottom of what could just as easily be described as a crevasse. There's a wider pool for posing in with an adjoining "yacht club" on the rear section of deck five, where two of the Corinthian's five restaurants also sit, including L'Encre, a light-filled oyster bar.

The other restaurant here is La Table by Yannick Alléno, where the decorated French chef will oversee menus for just 24 guests each evening (you'll have to pay extra to eat there). D'Angeac leads me into what is a remarkable space, with high ceilings, oak panelling and more carved pieces featuring animal scenes by the sculptor Rayssac. One wall is clad in enormous panels of obsidian-black glass that are rippled to look like a moonlit sea.

The Corinthian also includes a Guerlain spa, a theatre with a neighbouring recording studio and a separate cinema. There's a games room, a library and La Marina, a beach club, on the rear lower deck. The whole ship hums with the promise of a slightly placeless grandeur that tacks close to the mythology of the Orient Express without steaming into an iceberg of pastiche.

If d'Angeac is happy with the results, he's perhaps too stressed to show it. Will he be requesting a generous discount on a penthouse suite for him and his wife this summer? "I have to tell you a secret . . . " he says, smiling as he guides me back to the dockside. "I get very seasick. Perhaps we'll take the train."

Details

Simon Usborne was a guest of Orient Express (orient-express.com). Suites on the Orient Express Corinthian start at €11,400 for two nights, all-inclusive

Stories you might have missed

A quick guide to the best of FT Weekend

There's no such thing as the petrodollar

Weekend essay

War on Iran is changing the currency calculations of Gulf energy exporters. But the dollar's global role depends on far more than the denomination of a barrel of oil

UK attorney-general: 'I'm optimistic we're going to win the next election under Keir'

Lunch with the FT

Richard Hermer on the Starmer people don't see — and why the Chagos deal is about security not surrender

House of Fidelity — the dynasty at the heart of the investment powerhouse

Books

A journalist lifts the lid on how the Johnson family battled to keep control of the asset manager in a history packed with luminaries of finance

That sweater isn't fooling anyone, big guy

Style

Presidents and executives have tried to pull the wool over people's eyes and soften their image with knitwear, writes Robert Armstrong

LACMA's new David Geffen Galleries — insanely expensive but utterly astonishing

Arts

Breaking every rule of museum design, architect Peter Zumthor has created a $724mn blockbuster for Los Angeles

Beyond Marrakech — and into the Atlas on horseback

Travel

Six days in the saddle take Finn Beales from the hubbub of the city into the wild valleys of the Atlas Mountains

Find out about our latest stories first — follow FT Weekend on Instagram, Bluesky and X, and sign up to receive the FT Weekend newsletter every Saturday morning

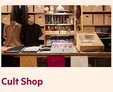
Copyright The Financial Times Limited 2026. All rights reserved.

Reuse this content Comments

Latest on Travel

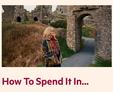
Lia Leendertz

In pursuit of an itinerant spring



Cult Shop

Anatomica Paris - menswear for the disciplined dresser



How To Spend It In...

A garden lover's guide to County Laois, by Catherine FitzGerald

HTSI

Inside designer Bill Bensley's fantastical Chiang Mai home

HTSI

Magnus Nilsson's restaurant was awarded two Michelin stars. Why is he now serving £12 lunches?

Travel

Beyond Marrakech – and into the Atlas on horseback

HTSI

Why we're all going bananas for banoffee pie

FT Globetrotter My Top 10: FT critics' favourite artworks

Madrid's Reina Sofía museum, reframed

Comments

Markets data delayed by at least 15 minutes. © THE FINANCIAL TIMES LTD 2026. FT and 'Financial Times' are trademarks of The Financial Times Ltd.
The Financial Times and its journalism are subject to a self-regulation regime under the FT Editorial Code of Practice.

A Nikkei Company